Tzeng [Ovid Tzeng, former minister of education] said that in the face of growing incidents of rumor-mongering and personal defamations online, a growing numbers of enlightened Internet users have started rectifying such falsified remarks, making the Internet more “correct” than ever.

Such ‘dark power’ will eventually be wiped out by the growing number of righteous netizens,” he said.

However, Tzeng added that what was more alarming was how some totalitarian regimes fabricated online identities with the aim of inciting rumors, or monitoring and censoring online activities.

Tzeng also mentioned that most European or US-based large-scale corporations were seeking to procure face-recognition software, which they mulled selling to authoritarian nations for the “dreadful purpose” of tracking down dissidents.
